The Early Stages Of The Battle

The Battle of Stalingrad began in July 1942, when the German army launched an offensive against the city of Stalingrad. The Germans quickly captured the city's outskirts, but they were unable to break into the city center. The Soviets fought back fiercely, and the battle soon became a bloody stalemate.

As the battle raged, the Soviets began to receive reinforcements. They also began to use new tactics, such as the use of snipers and close-quarters combat. The Germans were unable to adapt to these new tactics, and they began to lose ground.

The Turning Point

The turning point of the Battle of Stalingrad came in November 1942, when the Soviets launched a counteroffensive. The Soviets quickly surrounded the German army, and they cut off its supply lines. The Germans were trapped, and they had no choice but to surrender.

The Soviet victory at Stalingrad was a major turning point in World War II. It showed that the Germans could be defeated, and it gave the Allies hope that they could win the war.
