Solnit argues that the current system of nuclear deterrence, in which a handful of countries possess the power to destroy the world, is a form of "thermonuclear monarchy." This system gives these countries a veto over the future of all humanity, and it creates a constant threat of nuclear war.

Solnit shows how the thermonuclear monarchy is a threat to democracy. When a small group of people have the power to decide who lives and who dies, it undermines the principle of equal representation. It also creates a culture of fear and secrecy, which makes it difficult to have a public debate about nuclear weapons.

Solnit also argues that the thermonuclear monarchy is a threat to human civilization. Nuclear weapons have the potential to destroy not only human life, but also the environment. A nuclear war would have a catastrophic impact on the global climate, and it could lead to the extinction of many species.

Solnit concludes by calling for the abolition of nuclear weapons. She argues that the thermonuclear monarchy is a dangerous and unnecessary system that poses a grave threat to our planet. She calls for a global movement to demand the elimination of all nuclear weapons.

Thermonuclear Monarchy is a must-read for anyone who is concerned about the future of our planet. Solnit's powerful writing and persuasive arguments will leave you questioning the status quo and demanding change.
