Smith begins by examining the ways in which politicians use rhetoric and manipulation to gain and maintain power. He argues that politicians often use language to divide people and create fear and uncertainty. They do this by scapegoating certain groups of people, such as immigrants or Muslims, and by making promises that they know they cannot keep. This type of rhetoric is designed to appeal to people's emotions and to make them more likely to support the politician's agenda.

Smith also argues that politicians often engage in double standards. They hold themselves to a different set of rules than they do the rest of the population. For example, many politicians have been accused of breaking the law, but they have not been held accountable. This type of behavior sends the message that politicians are above the law and that they can do whatever they want.

The consequences of political hypocrisy and double standards are far-reaching. This behavior erodes public trust and makes it difficult for citizens to have meaningful conversations about important issues. It also makes it difficult for people to hold politicians accountable for their actions.

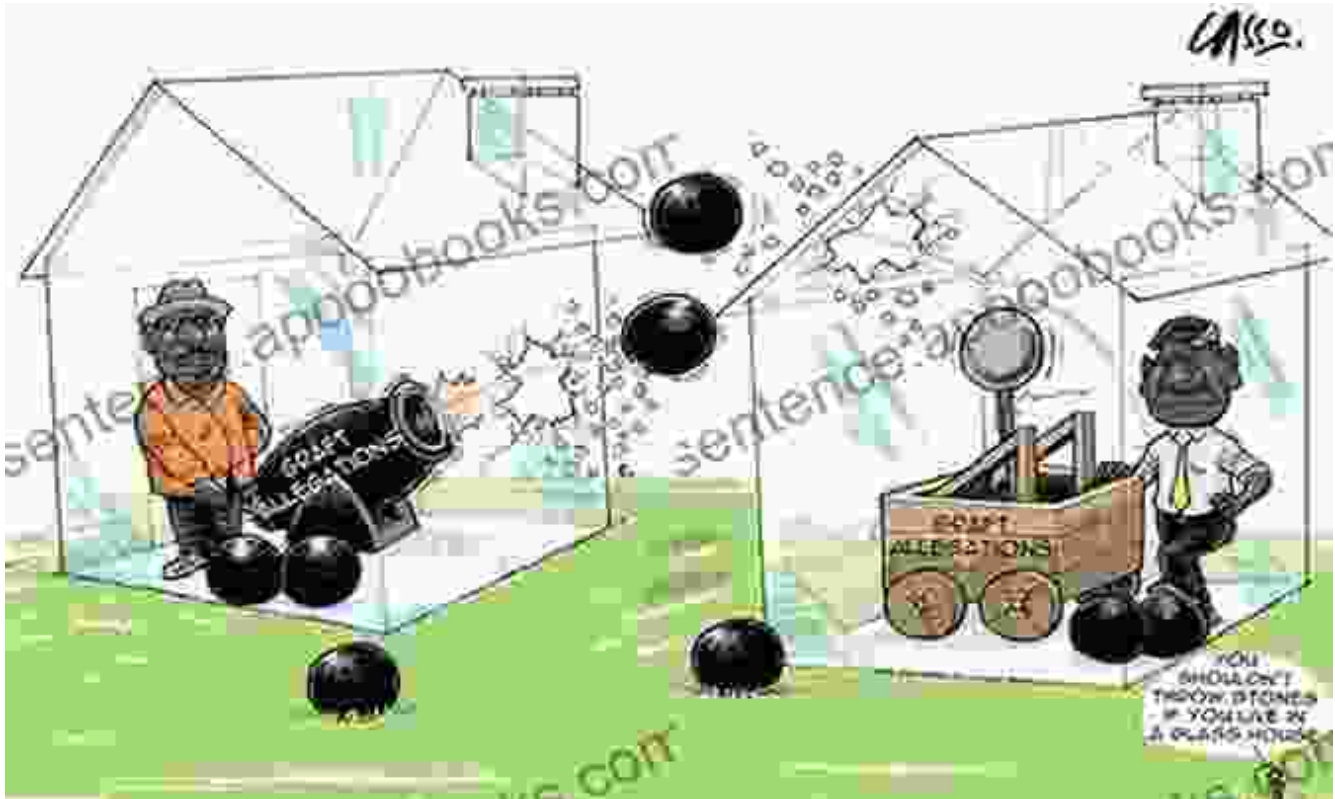

Smith concludes by arguing that we need to hold politicians to a higher standard. We need to demand that they be honest and transparent. We also need to hold them accountable for their actions. Only then can we restore public trust and have a meaningful democracy.
