Domestic terrorism is defined as acts of violence committed within the United States by individuals or groups motivated by political, social, or religious ideologies. School shootings, while not always classified as domestic terrorism, often share similar characteristics, including a desire to target innocent civilians and create a sense of fear and intimidation.

One of the most infamous examples of domestic terrorism in the United States is the Oklahoma City bombing. On April 19, 1995, Timothy McVeigh detonated a truck bomb outside the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building, killing 168 people and injuring hundreds more. McVeigh, a white supremacist, was motivated by anti-government beliefs and a desire to avenge the deaths of white separatists at Ruby Ridge and Waco.

The Oklahoma City bombing was a watershed moment in the history of domestic terrorism in the United States. It led to the passage of the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996, which expanded the federal government's ability to investigate and prosecute domestic terrorism cases. It also raised awareness of the threat posed by domestic terrorism and led to the creation of the FBI's National Domestic Preparedness Center.

In the years since the Oklahoma City bombing, there have been numerous other high-profile domestic terrorism attacks in the United States, including the 9/11 attacks, the Boston Marathon bombing, and the Las Vegas shooting. School shootings have also become increasingly common, with some of the most notable examples being the Columbine High School massacre, the Sandy Hook Elementary School shooting, and the Parkland High School shooting.

There is no single explanation for the rise in domestic terrorism and school shootings in the United States. However, there are a number of factors that may contribute to these trends, including:

- The increased availability of firearms
- The rise of social media and the internet, which provide platforms for extremists to spread their propaganda
- The increasing polarization of American society
- The lack of access to mental health services

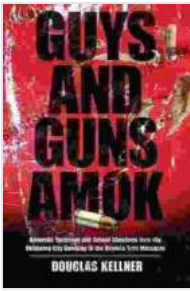

There is no easy solution to the problem of domestic terrorism and school shootings. However, there are a number of steps that can be taken to prevent these attacks, including:

- Enacting stricter gun control measures
- Providing more mental health services
- Addressing the root causes of extremism
- Improving coordination between law enforcement and intelligence agencies

The United States has a long history of domestic terrorism and school shootings. These attacks have caused untold suffering and loss of life. It is time for us to take action to prevent these tragedies from continuing.
