Origins: Disillusionment and Fear

The movement against globalism and Islam has its roots in a combination of factors, including economic insecurity, the perceived erosion of national sovereignty, and a sense of cultural disorientation. Economic inequality and job losses have fueled resentment towards global trade and immigration, while fears of terrorism and radicalization have stoked Islamophobia.

Strategies: Populism and Extremism

The movement against globalism and Islam has adopted various strategies to advance its agenda. Populist leaders have exploited public grievances to garner support, using divisive rhetoric and scapegoating marginalized groups, particularly Muslims. Extremist groups have employed violence and intimidation to spread fear and undermine social cohesion.

Far-right supporters gather at a rally, displaying Islamophobic slogans and symbols.

Impact: Polarization and Division

The movement against globalism and Islam has had a profound impact on European society. It has contributed to the rise of political polarization, eroding trust in institutions and undermining democratic values. Social divisions have deepened, as communities have become more segregated and distrustful of one another.
