Adolf Hitler is one of the most notorious figures in history. His rise to power and the atrocities committed by his regime are well-known. But there are also many lesser-known stories about Hitler, including the claim that he murdered his own niece.

Geli Raubal was the daughter of Hitler's half-sister, Angela. She was born in 1908 and grew up in close proximity to her uncle. In 1925, Geli moved into Hitler's apartment in Munich. She quickly became his favorite companion, and they spent a great deal of time together.

However, Geli's relationship with Hitler was not always easy. She was a strong-willed and independent woman, and she often clashed with her uncle's authoritarian personality. In 1931, Geli began a relationship with Emil Maurice, a young Austrian musician. Hitler was furious when he found out, and he forbade Geli from seeing Maurice again.

On September 18, 1931, Geli was found dead in Hitler's apartment. The official cause of death was suicide, but there have been many suspicions that Hitler murdered her. Some historians believe that Hitler killed Geli because he was afraid of her relationship with Maurice, while others believe that he killed her because he was jealous of her beauty.

There is no definitive evidence to prove that Hitler murdered Geli Raubal. However, the circumstances surrounding her death are certainly suspicious. The fact that she was found dead in Hitler's apartment, and that Hitler forbade her from seeing Maurice, raises questions about his involvement in her death.

The claim that Hitler murdered his niece is a serious one. If true, it would add another layer of darkness to his already evil legacy. However, it is important to remember that this is just a claim, and there is no definitive evidence to support it.

The book "WWII: Did Hitler Murder His Beautiful Niece?" explores the evidence for and against this claim. The book offers a fascinating look at one of the most controversial figures in history, and it is sure to keep readers guessing until the very end.
